The High Line Hotel

A former seminary that was once owned by Clement C. Moore, the man who penned “’Twas the Night Before Christmas,” the High Line Hotel (not to be confused with The Standard, High Line) is currently enjoying as much popularity and praise as the beloved nearby public park after which it is named. Although the eye candy here is plentiful, be sure to check out the Gothic splendor and delicate stained glass windows of The Refectory room.
